Description:

The UNIJURIS project examines to what extent states and regional organizations can apply their own legislation beyond their borders with a view to realizing international values. In recent years, unilateral assertions of jurisdiction to protect other global interests have become increasingly relevant outside the field of international crimes, in areas such as climate change, the protection of global fish stocks, the fight against corruption, combating marine pollution, the regulation of the Internet, or the disciplining of multinationals. These extensions of states' and organizations' jurisdictional arms to capture 'extraterritorial' situations in the socio-economic and environmental field occur in ways that are novel and have hardly been accounted for in legal scholarship. The innovative character of this project lies in its ambition to systematically map and critically analyse unilateral assertions of state jurisdiction that protect global environmental and social interests outside the field of international crimes.

Students will be able to provide research support in the form of desk research.
