Description:

Despite notable improvements in income, housing, health care access, education, and community facilities, social inequalities among youth remain considerable. Crucially, cross-national research even shows a widening health gap due to increases in adolescents' socio-economic inequality in the last fifteen years. Poverty among children and adolescents remains substantial, more families are fleeing their home country, and global developments seem to intensify feeling of insecurities and injustice, particularly among the least privileged groups. These inequalities threaten the wellbeing and health of youth. The growing social inequalities among youth are both a pressing problem and an emerging area of interdisciplinary research. This project aims to identify pathways to upward social mobility and societal participation. Which protective and risk factors affect social mobility? How can we instill hope in youth and facilitate social mobility? What do we know about health disparities in social strata? Internship candidates will help in reviewing the literature on social inequalities among youth, setting up and conducting research, analyzing research results, and writing up these results for reports.
