

Below, you will find an overview of minors that may be an interesting supplement to your programme. You can take the minor as a whole, or instead take several modules as a separate course that forms part of your optional course profile.

Are you interested in how aspects of gender, ethnicity, sexuality and religion, and related issues of inclusion and exclusion and of power relationships, are expressed in both the production and reception of media and culture and also in the media objects themselves? The minor Gender is a good option for you!

Many of the current conflicts and forms of inequality in the world (black/white, Western/non-Western, religious/non-religious, etc.) can be traced back to, and understood in terms of, the colonial past. Do you find it interesting to analyse how this inequality is expressed not only in media and culture, but also – in broad terms – in society and politics? Choose the minor Postcolonial Studies.

Are you interested in the steadily growing role that media and culture play in the shaping of the city, in contributing ideas about the future of the city and in working on solutions for all kinds of urban challenges currently facing cities (such as sustainability, liveability, mobility, inequality, privatisation, etc.)? The minor Creative Cities could be a good choice for you.

If you are mainly interested in the organisation of institutions and companies and if, in the future, you aim for an administrative, policy-related or management role in the field of media and culture, you may be interested in taking the minor Business Economics, in addition to the Media and Culture major.

Are you considering starting your own company and becoming an entrepreneur in the field of media and culture? Check out this minor: Entrepreneurship.

If you would like to focus on issues relating to youth, young people and education within the field of culture and media, the social sciences can offer a supplementary perspective. The following minors or separate modules from these minors could well be interesting: Child and Adolescent Relationships and Development or Youth Studies.

Do you believe that media and culture can help contribute to solving current social issues? You could supplement your major Media and Culture with the minor Sociology: Contemporary Social Problems. Here, you will learn to study social issues from a social sciences perspective and to arrive at policy solutions.

Are you interested in issues relating to migration, integration, cultural differences, nationalism and prejudice, and do you find it interesting to study these not only from the perspective of media and culture but also in terms of the social sciences? Check out the minor Multicultural Society.
